

When the agency responsible for California's roads spends $4 million on new cars and trucks, then parks them, unused, for two years, that's Craziifornia. When cancer warnings are required on buildings because they may contain estrogen or testosterone, that's Craziifornia. And when a full-frontal governmental assault on jobs and business drives enough people out of a state in ten years to double the population of Oregon, well, that's Craziifornia too. Through tale after outrageous, funny, tragic tale, "Craziifornia, Tales from the Tarnished State" explains why California is crashing, making it a must-read for all Californians and anyone who fears California may be coming their way soon.

“One rarely reads such a funny account of such a sad subject. This is a great book to read, tearfully, as you pack the house in Orange County and wait for the moving van to take you to Nevada.”

– Steven Greenhut, author and columnist

Laer Pearce has been helping corporations and local government agencies weave their way through California's regulatory jungle for 30 years. Sometimes he would like to leave the state – only to realize he's unemployable in any state that functions well enough to be worth moving to.
